Guffey, Colorado

Guffey is located in central Colorado, just off the southern edge of South Park. The town sits at an elevation of about 8,700 feet, and is surrounded by rolling hills and eroded peaks, exposing both late Eocene (about 35 million years old) lava and ash as well as Precambrian (1.1 billion years old) Pikes Peak granite. The highest local elevations are over 11,000 feet.

The region is generally quite dry, receiving most of its precipitation in the form of late spring snow and summer monsoonal thunderstorms.

The Project

I first became seriously interested in the local wildflowers in 2007, a wet year with lots of spring and summer growth. I had occasionally photographed flowers in earlier years, but that summer I began a deliberate effort to document as many as possible. By the time I had identified 100 different species (far more than I anticipated) I realized this was going to be a significant task!

At the end of 2007 I put together the first edition of this guide, and largely ignored it after that, although I continued collecting images of flowers in subsequent years. By 2017 I realized that I had run across dozens of flowers I had not previously recorded, and decided to update the guide and make a serious effort to put names to the handful of species that managed to elude identification. This guide was drawn from a collection of about 4,500 digital images of local wildflowers.

The Images

The project started out as a flower imaging exercise, with the consequence that the images do not always capture larger features of plants that can help identify them. I've largely stuck with focusing on just the flowers, so in some cases you might not be able to identify a specimen from just the image here. However, in all such cases the image will get you close – family and genus, leaving only a little uncertainty about the actual species.

Colors

The guide organizes the images by color: white, pink, red, orange, yellow, blue, and violet. Sometimes it was a value judgment which color to assign a flower. It is common for many flowers growing around Guffey to be lighter and less saturated than they might be in wetter places. In particular, red, blue, and violet flowers can all present as nearly white. Furthermore, red, blue, and violet flowers can all be confused for each other depending on the growing conditions and our own visual quirks. So if you find a purple flower and don't find it in the purple section, look also in the pink and blue sections.

In a few cases, I've included the same species in two different color sections because its actual color range may be surprisingly wide.

Sizes

Often the size of flowers will not be obvious in the images. I intend to add this information in a future edition, but for now, you'll need to rely more on the appearance of the flower, and perhaps take some cues from the depth of field of the images – close-ups of small flowers tend to have the background and foreground more out of focus than shots of larger flowers.

Image Information

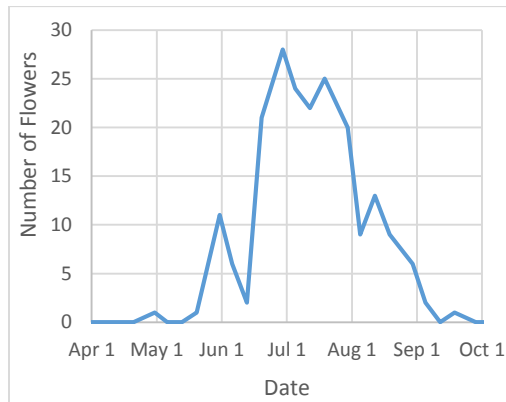

Each image is numbered, with the number corresponding to a table in the appendix providing additional information. The images themselves are captioned with one or two common names (generally the most common, but not always the only ones), the binomial name (genus and species), the family, and the date the image was made.

It isn't uncommon for there to be disagreement among experts about what family a plant is in, or what nomenclature to use for genus and species. A remarkable number of the flowers I identified in 2007 have since been assigned to different families, in part because DNA sequencing technology is shifting the traditional morphological classification schemes towards genetic ones. I've tried to use the most recent, most widely agreed upon family, genus, and species names, but they may not agree with what you find in some other guides. They should be sufficient, however, to allow you to pursue additional information for any flowers you might be particularly interested in.

The image dates will provide a general guideline for when you might encounter particular flowers. Do not worry if you think you've identified a flower but the date is quite different. Some flowers have long blooming periods. Also, Guffey is not immune from the effects of global climate change. Over the last 2 years we've seen a significant shift in conditions – shorter winters, earlier springs, drier summers. All of this impacts which plants thrive and when they appear and disappear. Our earliest flowers (usually Pasque flowers) often appear now in March, and our last ones (usually Pleated Gentian) may persist well into September.

This chart shows when the images in this guide were collected, from 2001 to 2017. June, July, and August are definitely the time when you want to be out looking!
